The People’s Liberation Army’s first aeronautical pentathlon, which was established in 2015, is proving a good read results at the 7th Military World Games under-taken in Wuhan, Hubei province, on Saturday.

Team member Liu Xiaoyan won the gold medal in the women’s two-persons free performance, and the team also took their seventh gold medal in the women’s free performance, and this will definitely bring the team to the top of the medals tally.

Wang said, “Aeronautical pentathlon is a very comprehensive program and requires a very high level of overall quality from each athlete, including physical, mental, mental and technical skills.”

The variety and high requirements of the program were obligations for the athletes, many of whom were new graduates or specialists in the field.

For example, in 2015 when he joined the team at 20, he was not only learning the art of betting, but also had no experience in the field. So Yang, the oldest member of the team, and the only one not professionally engaged in professional sports, was 23 when he declined a pilot's commission in 2015.

At the age of 20, many other athletes are already world champions, and joint pilots are already mature. After growing in three years of air display, Wang said all members were fully prepared for the knitting methods from scratch.

Wang said, “We encourage innovation and creative ideas from our members. We work out two to three new aerobatic shows each day during the five-day event in Changchun to mark the PLA Air Force’s 70th birthday, which will fall on Sunday. Visitors with children during an open house at an air base in Changchun to mark the PLA Air Force’s 70th birthday. The theme was ‘A spirit of sports and the building of a shared future for mankind’. Held at the Samarkand Monumen-tal Museum in Samarkand’s surround-ings Aughij is the district, the event was initiated by David Gross, general director of the China-Europe Forum-Bekos and Wu Ching-kuo, a member of the IOC’s executive board, shared their memories of Samarkand and some key moments in his life.
